In it, he demonstrates for the first time his conception of 'deconstruction,' an apparently inexplicable concept which enables the analysis of 'inter-textuality' and 'binary-oppositions,' to be revealed. 'Writing and Difference,' is of course a difficult text, and analytic philosophers don't even bother with it, though that may be their greatest mistake, for Derrida attempts (and not without success) to demonstrate that the notion of purely objective, enlightened truth seeking is an ...
